Introduction

Twitter has become essential to the proliferation of news and incident reporting to the general public. Twitter may be the first place that people report or search for information related to incidents like natural disasters. In this assignment, we will train recurrent neural networks (RNNs) to perform natural language processing (NLP) on tweets and predict which tweets are about natural disasters.

Method

Kaggle data containing 10,000 tweets were downloaded and analyzed using Jupyter Notebooks (Howard, et al. 2019). The tweets were processed to prepare for input into recurrent neural network models which predict whether a Tweet was referring to disaster. Model metrics were examined and compared.

Results and Insights

The first model used a bidirectional architecture, which allowed the model to traverse the sequence in both directions. The baseline RNN uses an initial embedding layer with an embedding dimension set at 200, and a Long-Short-Term-Memory (LSTM) layer in the bidirectional wrapper. Text pre-processing prior to vectorization was not used for the baseline model. This model uses the default settings: 64 units, the kernel initializer, 'glorot_uniform', and the default bias initializer, 'zeros'. The glorot_uniform initializer uses Xaviar initialization to force the variances of the activations to be uniform across each layer, which helps to prevent vanishing or exploding gradients. The decision to keep the initializer at zero is supported by evidence that small non-zero initializer values intended to trigger all ReLU activation functions do not yield consistent performance enhancements. The input dimension is determined by aggregating the inputs from the training and testing sets to estimate the total vocabulary size. The next layer is a fully connected layer using ReLU activation, followed by a dropout layer with dropout set to 0.2. The fully connected output layer uses the sigmoid function as the classifier to predict whether the tweet pertains to a natural disaster. The model is compiled using the Nadam optimizer initialized at 0.001, and uses BinaryCrossEntropy loss. The fit generator uses early stopping with patience set to 8. This straightforward approach achieved an accuracy of about 56.5%. We experimented with two additional models where we modified the design by adding additional dense and dropout layers before and after the LSTM layer, but only somewhat impacted the predictive accuracy. Further analysis of RNN architectures is necessary to assess and test the optimality of varying network designs.

Next, new preprocessing techniques were applied to the data. These included formatting the text using transformations such as making all words lower-case and removing tweets with a minimum number of characters or http identifiers. To remove stop words, the text was lemmatized. The words in the remaining tweets were again tokenized and padded for vectorization. NLTK packages were used as part of the preprocessing workflow. This pre-processing on the training data improved model accuracy by about 2%.

We then created another model to predict which tweets referred to natural disasters. This new recurrent neural network first used the newly pre-processed and lemmatized data and then encoded that data via Term Frequency - Inverse Document Frequency encoding. Subsequently, we again padded this data so that the model inputs would have consistent lengths. We then used this newly prepared data in a train - validation - test design with the LSTM model being trained on the training dataset and the hyperparameters being tuned via the validation dataset. The output layer of this LSTM model was a dense layer with a sigmoid activation function. Accordingly, we then leveraged predictions for the validation dataset to identify a cutoff value (for assigning predictions as 0 or 1) that would maximize the accuracy of the model's performance. The accuracy of this model's predictions for the validation dataset was 0.58. (Notably, though, 57% of the original training dataset corresponded to non-disaster-related tweets, so this model appears to just barely outperform a model that would assign all observations as non-disasters). To complement this analysis via visualizations, we also constructed Receiving Operating Characteristic (ROC) and Precision-Recall Curves to display the performance of the model's predictions for the validation dataset. We then applied the LSTM model to the test dataset and transformed the outputs into predictions as 0 or 1 based on the previously determined optimal cutoff value and obtained the F1 score from Kaggle of 0.42966.

For our last recurrent neural network model, we created another LSTM model that applied variations to the text preprocessing approach and model design compared to the previously constructed models. The new text pre-processing methodology included adjusting the text to be lowercase; removing non-alphanumeric characters, hyperlinks, and non-English words; and lemmatizing each word. The text of the training data tweets were then tokenized, encoded, padded, and added into a RNN model. This RNN model contained an embedding layer, a bidirectional LSTM layer, a dense layer with 64 units, a layer with 20% dropout, and a final dense output layer with a sigmoid activation function. Prior to fitting the model, we split the training data into training and validation datasets, so that we could fit the model with the training data and identify the ideal hyperparameters using the validation data. Once trained, this model achieved a disaster prediction accuracy for the training dataset of 0.5764.

Recurrent neural networks can be powerful tools for addressing many types of natural language processing problems, including sentiment analysis, language translation, text generation / prediction, and caption generation from image data (Géron 2019). We evaluated various architecture and preprocessing approaches to design RNNs for disaster tweet data to predict which tweets were describing disasters. The modifications that we used did not result in large changes in performance, with accuracies between 0.56 and 0.58. We note that 57% of the training data observations corresponded to non-disasters. Further research could examine what improvements could be made to our RNN models to better harness the power of this tweet data in a way that would more accurately predict which tweets describe disasters, so that experts, journalists, and other public officials could more quickly and efficiently be notified of unfolding disasters.

Remove URL prefixes before applying stop word and tokenization functions:

The following method utilizes regex to target any string beginning with "http" and capture the full string that follows:

Stop Words:

Commonly used words in language provide important grammatical structure for human communication, they do little for machine interpretation. It is a convention to remove these words from our modeling vocabulary entirely. I'll be using the standard english stop words from the NLTK(Natural Language ToolKit) library, and punctuation from the string library.

In [16]:
import string
from nltk.corpus import stopwords

stop_words = stopwords.words('english')

#add punctuation char's to stopwords list
stop_words += list(string.punctuation) # <-- contains !"#$%&'()*+,-./:;<=>?@[\]^_`{|}~

#add integers

Tokenization:

Apply both tokenization and omission of stop words with the below function and apply it to the text column of the tweet text

Remove the remaining noise such as words containing integers, or any tokens that are not alphabetical.

Now we save the test dataset predictions to a CSV for submission into Kaggle

In [86]:
```
Add the ID column to the front of the cnn predictions dataframe
rnn_lstm_pred3_df.insert(0, 'id', disaster_testing_data['id'])

Output predictions to csv
rnn_lstm_pred3_df.to_csv('test_predictions_rnn_lstm_v3.csv', index=False)

Having submitted our predicitons into Kaggle, we now display the score obtained

In [88]:
```
Display the kaggle results
import matplotlib.pyplot as plt

```
plt.figure(figsize = (15, 15))
kaggle_results = plt.imread('Kaggle_results_rnn_lstm_v3.jpg')
plt.imshow(kaggle_results)
plt.axis("off")
plt.show()
